GREEN OLIVES

The varieties used primarily are Gordal (Queens) and Manzanilla. They come from around the Mediterranean Basin areas and South America. Some companies will use a Hojiblanca variety, but they are not the preferred variety for table olives. Hojiblanca olives have a tough, woody texture and are used mainly in oil production or for cheap salad olives.

The counts of olives are per kilo, not by the jar or pound. When comparing pricing it is equally important to look at the size of the olive and the drained weight. If there is no declaration of either, the chances are that you are paying too much and getting an inferior product.

Green Olives are used primarily in salads and as a garnish to compliment your favorite dish. They are still the favorite condiment in martinis. Ron-Son also carries Sicilian style olives stuffed with many different items, which have become very fashionable to use in making upscale martinis.

RIPE OLIVES Ron Son has selected the most competitive olive producers from around the world, depending on crop conditions and varieties available. These selected packers must be ISO 9000 certified and deliver the highest quality ripe olives that exceed the standards of the USDA. Many people don't know that ripe olives are actually green olives that have been oxidized in large tanks by pumping air into a caustic soda brine to turn them black. They are picked green so the olive doesn't become soft and break during the pitting and slicing process. This also reduces the oil content in the olive and prevents the "bleeding out" of the oil during the thermal processing at high temperatures.

SLICED RIPE These are often used as a pizza topping and are popular on salad bars. They are a popular addition in Mexican cuisine and often used as a garnish on salads and many other recipes. They are now available in pouches. This is an efficient packaging for large volume customers where shipping and waste disposal are an issue.

PITTED RIPE OLIVES Available in small, medium and large sizes used primarily as a condiment with sandwiches or in salads. When using them they will add a wonderful flavor and color to make a great presentation to your favorite dish.
